The Mexico Miracle Continued

By Dr. David Walls-Kaufman

As I wrote here in a previous article, five years ago, the Mexican government started a chiropractic pilot study in the largest Mexico City hospitals. They found that the full inclusion of chiropractic led to a 50% across the board reduction in healthcare costs.

The study has continued to grow as Mexico opens chiropractic clinics in more hospitals. Recently, the government asked Parker College of Chiropractic in Texas that they wanted to open as many chiropractic colleges as Parker College could open to graduate as many Doctors of Chiropractic as possible in order to go on helping rationalize costs and improve public health.

This "full inclusion" of chiropractic meant that the chiropractor was used not as a fancy physical therapist treating back pain. Instead, the chiropractor's unique expertise in the finding and removing nervous system interference that impairs the body's innate design to heal and thrive, was used in every type of case in the hospital.

Dr. Fabricio Mancini, President of Parker College, described how the chiropractors were even examining the nervous systems of tiny preemies for nerve interference. The doctors of chiropractic were delicately giving these infants spinal adjustments inside their incubators in order to open up the nervous system pathways so that these children had the best chance for survival.

The results of the pilot study continue to be remarkable. Now, the project is moving into other Latin American countries. A pilot study is now underway in Columbia. Two more are being discussed for Paraguay and Peru.

The aim of the Paraguay and Peru projects is to organize a class of youngsters who will train in chiropractic at the Mexico City College and then return to hospitals back home to bring chiropractic nervous system care as a mandatory strategy for fighting all disease and advancing national health.

I'll keep you posted!
